

I feel that the FCC should not implement standards for copyright protection on DTV. For years viewers and consumers have been able to enjoy programming at their leisure, since the VCR has become affordable and universally available. Giving networks the ability to take away that ability is a terrible thought. When VCR as well as the audio cassette tape first became available. Networks and media corporations claimed that it would be the downfall of their industry, unless it was regulated. That was an awfully long time ago, and none of their predictions have come to pass. While I can understand the need for a marker that would tell digital video records not to distribute the show which they have recorded. Marking a show as unrecordable or preventing the user from navigating through that show as they see fit is unacceptable.
